Her husband is broken up, however, and so is the daughter, who had made friends with the young folks of the Hornblower family. Hill-christ in wordy debate with Horn-blower, had pointed out why Hornblower, had pointed out why Horn-blower was not a gentleman. Now, as he sees the broken body of the young woman being borne away and realizes what the Hillchrist victory means, he wonders if steoping to dis-honorable methods it were worth the price. And he utters the closing speech of the play:
